A Moscow court ordered the release of a punk band from Leningrad on Friday. The RIA Novosti news agency reported that the band had been arrested and accused of violating a law against the promotion of "violent extremism" by promoting "extremist" beliefs. The group was part of a traveling festival that took place in the city of Zheleznogorsk in May. The judge ruled that the group's performance did not violate the law as it was spontaneous and did not take place in a traditional concert hall. A member of the band claimed that the arrests were part of a plot against Russian youth. The band was escorted to the first floor of the courtroom, but was later moved to a lower one because of limited space. The arrests came at a time of increasing repression against punk rock in Russia. The city of Nizhny Novgorod in western Russia has been known to ban punk bands for promoting "extremism." U.S. officials have repeatedly urged Russia to release members of Pussy Riot, a Russian punk group, who were arrested during a "punk prayer" performance at the altar of the Moscow cathedral in February. A Russian court sentenced three Pussy Riot members to two years in prison, but then reduced the sentences to probation after it ruled the women had not broken the law.
